

Bangor to Llangaffo (Anglesey) and then back to Llanfairpwllgwyngyllgogerychwyrndrobwlllantysiliogogogoch.

This walk wasn't one of my better walks, but I always cherish the experience all the same. I wanted to walk from Bangor to Holyhead, and as you can see from one of the photos, I was only 22 miles away at Menai. Following the A4080 and the A5 I quickly found that the pavement stops just after Llanfair P.G. So I followed the official cycle path. The problem with this cycle path is that it mainly follows the more quieter roads rather than an actual path, although it does start that way. Another problem is that it takes you miles away from where you want to be heading and I quickly began to realise that I wasn't going to get to Holyhead at all if I followed this path much longer. So when I reached the village of Llangaffo, I decided to try to head back to Bangor. I didn't want to go back along the route I had just followed and tried to head back directly. This wasn't such a great idea because there are very few signposts and not being familiar with the towns and villages on Anglesey, apart from the ones along the railway route I quickly lost my bearings. Eventually I managed to reach Gaewen, which is a town and has a main road running through it. I managed to rejoin the A4080 and got back to Llanfair P.G. where things were familiar again. I began to realise that I didn't have enough time to get back to Bangor and so waited for the train at Llanfair P.G.

By Philip Catherall